Commission Chair Finley

Dear Finley,

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon.

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes, 70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide. While these common species are not threatened or endangered, also consider that there are thousands of Washington Ground Squirrels in Oregon, which are listed currently as endangered. No other species has been removed from the state's endangered species list with a population of fewer than 100 individuals statewide or when they are absent from a significant portion of their range. Today, wolves in the state are almost exclusively confined to the northeast portion, making this population still highly vulnerable. The Commission has a responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Much of the recent success of wolf dispersal to the south and west regions of the state has been directly due to Oregon's emphasis on nonlethal wolf and livestock management. If wolves are delisted and this emphasis reduced, it will impact the wolf's ability to disperse to these significant portions of range. As seen, improperly managed conflicts with livestock represent the single greatest challenge to wolf conservation. And if wolf and livestock conflicts are not well managed, as frequently seen elsewhere, wolves pay a heavy toll through lethal control and illegal killing.

I am concerned that delisting could stop or dramatically slow wolf recovery in Oregon if certain vital protections are not maintained.

These protections specifically include primary nonlethal approaches to managing wolves and livestock on public lands, working with landowners to reduce attractants on private lands, and promoting awareness of the tools and methods that allow wolves and people to coexist. The Commission has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Moving too quickly to eliminate Oregon Endangered Species Act (ESA) protection could reverse the positive trends in restoration and recolonization underway in Oregon.

The Commission's hand is not forced on an all-or-nothing, black-or-white "delist now." The more prudent alternative is to consider downlisting the species from endangered to threatened. This would enable wolves to continue to have the vital state protections they need, while simultaneously recognizing the progress the state has made to recover wolves. And, it would leave wolves fully protected in the western part of Oregon, where they are just starting to expand, while allowing for greater management flexibility in the eastern part of the state.

In closing, I would request that the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission maintain state ESA protection for wolves and a strong emphasis on proactive nonlethal wolf management and livestock protection efforts to encourage wolf recovery statewide.

Thank you for your consideration.

Commission Chair Finley

Dear Finley,

The following so exactly reflects my support for taking the necessary measures to ensure the recovery of Oregon's wolf population:

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon.

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes, 70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide. While these common species are not threatened or endangered, also consider that there are thousands of Washington Ground Squirrels in Oregon, which are listed currently as endangered. No other species has been removed from the state's endangered species list with a population of fewer than 100 individuals statewide or when they are absent from a significant portion of their range. Today, wolves in the state are almost exclusively confined to the northeast portion, making this population still highly vulnerable. The Commission has a responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Much of the recent success of wolf dispersal to the south and west regions of the state has been directly due to Oregon's emphasis on nonlethal wolf and livestock management. If wolves are delisted and this emphasis reduced, it will impact the wolf's ability to disperse to these significant portions of range. As seen, improperly managed conflicts with livestock represent the single greatest challenge to wolf conservation. And if wolf and livestock conflicts are not well managed, as frequently seen elsewhere, wolves pay a heavy toll through lethal control and illegal killing.

I am concerned that delisting could stop or dramatically slow wolf recovery in Oregon if certain vital protections are not maintained.

These protections specifically include primary nonlethal approaches to managing wolves and livestock on public lands, working with landowners to reduce attractants on private lands, and promoting awareness of the tools and methods that allow wolves and people to coexist. The Commission has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Moving too quickly to eliminate Oregon Endangered Species Act (ESA) protection could reverse the positive trends in restoration and recolonization underway in Oregon.

The Commission's hand is not forced on an all-or-nothing, black-or-white "delist now." The more prudent alternative is to consider downlisting the species from endangered to threatened. This would enable wolves to continue to have the vital state protections they need, while simultaneously recognizing the progress the state has made to recover wolves. And, it would leave wolves fully protected in the western part of Oregon, where they are just starting to expand, while allowing for greater management flexibility in the eastern part of the state.

In closing, I would request that the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission maintain state ESA protection for wolves and a strong emphasis on proactive nonlethal wolf management and livestock protection efforts to encourage wolf recovery statewide.

Thank you for your consideration.

Commission Chair Finley

Dear Finley,

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge, no, demand, you maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon. Removing them will most likely decimate their numbers once again. Ranchers will be thrilled at the prospect of killing them. It's just not time yet.

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes, 70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide. Commission Chair Finley

Dear Finley,

Wolves play a vital role in wildlife habitat and I want that to continue here in Oregon!

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon.

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes, 70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide. While these common species are not threatened or endangered, also consider that there are thousands of Washington Ground Squirrels in Oregon, which are listed currently as endangered. No other species has been removed from the state's endangered species list with a population of fewer than 100 individuals statewide or when they are absent from a significant portion of their range. Today, wolves in the state are almost exclusively confined to the northeast portion, making this population still highly vulnerable. The Commission has a responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Much of the recent success of wolf dispersal to the south and west regions of the state has been directly due to Oregon's emphasis on nonlethal wolf and livestock management. If wolves are delisted and this emphasis reduced, it will impact the wolf's ability to disperse to these significant portions of range. As seen, improperly managed conflicts with livestock represent the single greatest challenge to wolf conservation. And if wolf and livestock conflicts are not well managed, as frequently seen elsewhere, wolves pay a heavy toll through lethal control and illegal killing.

I am concerned that delisting could stop or dramatically slow wolf recovery in Oregon if certain vital protections are not maintained. These protections specifically include primary nonlethal approaches to managing wolves and livestock on public lands, working with landowners to reduce attractants on private lands, and promoting awareness of the tools and methods that allow wolves and people to coexist. The Commission has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon. Moving too quickly to eliminate Oregon Endangered Species Act (ESA) protection could reverse the positive trends in restoration and recolonization underway in Oregon.

The Commission's hand is not forced on an all-or-nothing, black-or-white "delist now." The more prudent alternative is to consider downlisting the species from endangered to threatened. This would enable wolves to continue to have the vital state protections they need, while simultaneously recognizing the progress the state has made to recover wolves. And, it would leave wolves fully protected in the western part of Oregon, where they are just starting to expand, while allowing for greater management flexibility in the eastern part of the state.

In closing, I would request that the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission maintain state ESA protection for wolves and a strong emphasis on proactive nonlethal wolf management and livestock protection efforts to encourage wolf recovery statewide.

Thank you for your consideration.

Dear Finley,

To remove Oregon's admirable protections of its wolves would be a tragic mistake, especially if the removal is the result of bowing to special interests.

In my opinion, the primary reason cattle ranchers don't like wolves is that it reduces their profit margin (wolves make cows move, which reduces the fat content on the cows). I would rather pay more for beef than reduce the protection on wolves.

The Commission has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Moving too quickly to eliminate Oregon Endangered Species Act (ESA) protection could reverse the positive trends in restoration and recolonization underway in Oregon.

The Commission's hand is not forced on an all-or-nothing, black-or-white "delist now." The more prudent alternative is to consider downlisting the species from endangered to threatened. This would enable wolves to continue to have the vital state protections they need, while simultaneously recognizing the progress the state has made to recover wolves. And, it would leave wolves fully protected in the western part of Oregon, where they are just starting to expand, while allowing for greater management flexibility in the eastern part of the state.

In closing, I would request that the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission maintain state ESA protection for wolves and a strong emphasis on proactive nonlethal wolf management and livestock protection efforts to encourage wolf recovery statewide.

Thank you for your consideration.

Dear Finley,

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon. We only have 88 for the whole state and we have elk killing live stock, attacking people and coyotes running free through out the city. We need more not less to restore the balance

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes,

70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide. While these common species are not threatened or endangered, also consider that there are thousands of Washington Ground Squirrels in Oregon, which are listed currently as endangered. No other species has been removed from the state's endangered species list with a population of fewer than 100 individuals statewide or when they are absent from a significant portion of their range. Today, wolves in the state are almost exclusively confined to the northeast portion, making this population still highly vulnerable.

The Commission has a responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Much of the recent success of wolf dispersal to the south and west regions of the state has been directly due to Oregon's emphasis on nonlethal wolf and livestock management. If wolves are delisted and this emphasis reduced, it will impact the wolf's ability to disperse to these significant portions of range. As seen, improperly managed conflicts with livestock represent the single greatest challenge to wolf conservation. And if wolf and livestock conflicts are not well managed, as frequently seen elsewhere, wolves pay a heavy toll through lethal control and illegal killing.

I am concerned that delisting could stop or dramatically slow wolf recovery in Oregon if certain vital protections are not maintained.

These protections specifically include primary nonlethal approaches to managing wolves and livestock on public lands, working with landowners to reduce attractants on private lands, and promoting awareness of the tools and methods that allow wolves and people to coexist. The Commission has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Dear Finley,

I cannot imagine why Oregon Fish and Wildlife would entertain delisting wolves under the states Endangered Species Act. Their population has hardly grown. You should not bow to the pressure of ranchers and industry. Wolves are an incredible species. Your position should not be one of delisting, but of education and protection.

Dear Finley,

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon. During the past three years, I have watched the growing movement of ranchers to delist wolves and the OFWC has buckled under the pressure. The same kind of pressure has been applied to the roundup of wild horses on BLM land. The ranchers are for-profit; the wolves and horses are there at the pleasure of providing habitat to species we love. We are not in it for profit; we are in it to protect which we believe is YOUR JOB. Ranchers can seek compensation for wolf kills; they also write their losses off on their income taxes. They also raise the price of their beef beyond reasonable cost of living raises. It is time that the OFWC protects our wildlife rather than buckle to the ranchers who would kill every last wolf in the state given the opportunity. We also have ranchers in Eastern Oregon who would cede from the state and join the state of Idaho so they could kill wolves freely, without breaking the law. If a lion is killed in Africa by a great white hunter...the world is in an uproar. But what of the magnificent wolf in North America? When will we start treating our wildlife heritage as a national treasure? It could happen on your watch if you refuse to buckle to the demands of ranchers and hunters. The wolf and other predators should not be listed as "game" animals. There is no sport in killing just to kill. There are plenty of ungulates that put food on the table and provide hunters with their need to kill. We need our predators to keep those same animal herds healthy and culled of the unfit. We don't need trigger happy hunters to do the job nature already does quite well. When predators become a problem, the DFW can eliminate the problem predator; we do not need wolf hunting parties populated by wolf haters.

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes, 70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide. Dear Finley,

When I sign petitions to Fish and Wildlife agencies in all the anti-wolf states in this country, I always say how proud I am to live in a state that values the importance of wolves. Please continue to be a defender and give the wolves a chance to truly make a comeback.

Wolves need to be counted as packs rather than individual animals and they are still in peril in this state.

Dear Finley,

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon. As an Oregonian, I have always been proud of our states wildlife protection laws and commitment to the environment but the potential action to delist wolves is truly disappointing. The Commission's hand is not forced on an all-or-nothing, black-or-white "delist now." The more prudent alternative is to consider downlisting the species from endangered to threatened. This would enable wolves to continue to have the vital state protections they need, while simultaneously recognizing the progress the state has made to recover wolves. And, it would leave wolves fully protected in the western part of Oregon, where they are just starting to expand, while allowing for greater management flexibility in the eastern part of the state.

In closing, I would request that the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission maintain state ESA protection for wolves and a strong emphasis on proactive nonlethal wolf management and livestock protection efforts to encourage wolf recovery statewide.

Thank you for your consideration.

Commission Chair Finley

Dear Finley,

My name is Jan Nelson. I am a farmer and forestland owner in Lane County. I have a small flock of sheep and goats who serve as groundskeepers in our orchard and provide manure for the garden. As a child living in a cabin in the North Woods of Minnesota, I grew up eating venison and duck, that my father shot; and mutton from my aunt and uncle's farm. Many nights the wolves lulled me to sleep. Back then nobody considered killing wolves to keep them from preying on deer.

Our property in the Coast Range foothills. We've seen cougars, coyotes, and bears here.

I am the primary guard animal for my sheep and goats aided by a donkey. I consider those few farmers and ranchers who want predators eliminated, lazy; especially if you are using public lands. You're lazy and big crybabies. As for ODFW, we know you keep your jobs by making money selling hunting tags. Are you serious in maintaining that more than 81 wolves will impact anyone who is a real hunter.

Oregon should expand wolf populations. I would love to hear them again. I want to hear them on and around our property in the Coast Range.

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon.

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes,

70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide. While these common species are not threatened or endangered, also consider that there are thousands of Washington Ground Squirrels in Oregon, which are listed currently as endangered. No other species has been removed from the state's endangered species list with a population of fewer than 100 individuals statewide or when they are absent from a significant portion of their range. Today, wolves in the state are almost exclusively confined to the northeast portion, making this population still highly vulnerable.

The Commission has a responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon.

Much of the recent success of wolf dispersal to the south and west regions of the state has been directly due to Oregon's emphasis on nonlethal wolf and livestock management. If wolves are delisted and this emphasis reduced, it will impact the wolf's ability to disperse to these significant portions of range. As seen, improperly managed conflicts with livestock represent the single greatest challenge to wolf conservation. And if wolf and livestock conflicts are not well managed, as frequently seen elsewhere, wolves pay a heavy toll through lethal control and illegal killing.

I am concerned that delisting could stop or dramatically slow wolf recovery in Oregon if certain vital protections are not maintained. These protections specifically include primary nonlethal approaches to managing wolves and livestock on public lands, working with landowners to reduce attractants on private lands, and promoting awareness of the tools and methods that allow wolves and people to coexist. The Commission has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that wolves are restored to significant portions of their native range in Oregon. Moving too quickly to eliminate Oregon Endangered Species Act (ESA) protection could reverse the positive trends in restoration and recolonization underway in Oregon.

The Commission's hand is not forced on an all-or-nothing, black-or-white "delist now." The more prudent alternative is to consider downlisting the species from endangered to threatened. This would enable wolves to continue to have the vital state protections they need, while simultaneously recognizing the progress the state has made to recover wolves. And, it would leave wolves fully protected in the western part of Oregon, where they are just starting to expand, while allowing for greater management flexibility in the eastern part of the state.

In closing, I would request that the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission maintain state ESA protection for wolves and a strong emphasis on proactive nonlethal wolf management and livestock protection efforts to encourage wolf recovery statewide.

Thank you for your consideration.

Dear Finley,

As a Defenders of Wildlife supporter and someone who cares deeply about wolves, I am writing to urge you to maintain state protections for wolves in Oregon.

Special interest groups such as ranchers should not have prioritized influence on this decision. The wolves were here first and killed off by hunters and ranchers. They are essential for a healthy ecosystem and belong here. As a taxpayer, I deplore your endangering their recovery by removing state protections.

While the overall trajectory is steady growth of the population, the wolf population is still very small and tenuous in comparison to the more than 6,000 mountain lions, 25,000 black bears, 40,000 coyotes, 70,000 elk and 200,000 deer statewide.
